

TITLE: What Really Creates Change in People for the Better

AUTHOR(S): Lynette Lubiak

PRESENTER(S): Lynette Lubiak

STUDENT SUBMISSION: Yes

TOPIC/TARGET AUDIENCE: This paper targets policy which in turn develops supports for underserved populations with serious mental health. It also targets program developers and researchers by creating the positive acceptance and resiliency of people with this disease

ABSTRACT: A huge disparity that can lead into many issues is understanding and treating people with schizophrenia. This means that pushing people into a box who are dealing with a serious mental health challenge does not help anyone. There are leading therapies that are described in the paper I wrote, including using these therapies to essentially write over the defective process contained in the neurons. It is expensive, but the maintenance phase could lead to promising discovery about other mental health issues and the reduction of hospitalizations created by this disease that hurts so many people. Leading to new policy that support underserved communities.

OBJECTIVE(S): Identify a therapy that actual works for social cognition and to learn where to go from here. To differentiate between the past way of looking at schizophrenia and how to understand the non-mythical ways it affects people; with giving a perspective of how to support them.
